May 5, 2009 (FPRC) -- Dublin, OH - Barina Craft, a manufacturer of home furnishings, is marking the Summer of 2009 with the introduction of their flush bar top as a standard optional feature.

Traditional bar designs, whether for home, tavern or club, usually include a large distinctive molding which surrounds the top surface. This rail normally protrudes above the bar top acting as an arm rest and potentially containing some of the spills. Since the vast majority of bars are simply rectangular plywood boxes in various configurations, the arm rail and other moulding strips fastened to corners and in patterns are what provide the styling characteristics. These architectural details are often a different wood species or finished to make them compliment the interior design of the room as well as standing out.

As an alternative, many contemporary designs incorporate a flat or smooth bar top. These may offer a little more surface area from the same footprint, translating into a slight increase in the space available for drinks and garnishes.

In keeping with classic wooden boat design, many if not most had smooth decks with few if any protruding elements other than hardware. You may now choose a level plane mounted or recessed bar top for your home bar. Both reflect the beauty and grace of traditional nautical designs. Barina Craft's growing list of standard features translates into an extensive array of combinations for virtually any home bar wish list or requirement.
