December 23, 2011 (FPRC) -- LOMBARD, IL -- Ken 'Bucky' Buckman, CEO of Tradetec Skyline, a company selling trade show displays in Chicago, was recently featured in an interview published on CEOIntroNet.com.

CEO IntroNet is a site dedicated to successful CEOs and provides a trusted, private, secure and exclusive way for sitting CEOs, Presidents, Executive Directors, Managing Partners and other chief decision makers to connect with each other. Members are fully vetted and can connect and network with each other, regardless of geographical, industry or other boundaries.

During the interview, Buckman shared how his company is adapting to the changing world of trade shows and how Tradetec Skyline works diligently to keep costs fixed for each trade show stand in Chicago, meaning customers won't have surprises when the final bill arrives.

"We design amazing trade show displays, but what really sets us apart is our predictive budgeting. We've made an effort over the last three years to make the billing process less painful, so we guarantee fixed labor and fixed freight costs. We want the budget you get upfront to be the budget you pay in the end. Aside from budgeting, companies want to know how they can get more viable traffic into their booth. That's what the Board wants to hear at budgeting time. So we are providing more around marketing services that are technology driven that can prove to get 40% more traffic to your booth," said Ken Buckman, CEO of Tradetec Skyline.

In addition to the one on one interview, Buckman also took part in a break out panel discussion focusing on the economic outlook for 2012. Buckman and the other panelists, Tim McGuire of Cutters Studios and Deborah Sawyer of Environmental Design International, all agreed that the outlook for 2012 is good, especially in the marketing and environmental services worlds. All three have reported a hiring surge, and this is a trend that the Chicago trade show exhibits company expects to continue through 2012.

"Optimism is huge for growing business in 2012; it takes a positive attitude and focus to move forward after this recession. Change in business made us leaner and smarter. Tradetec Skyline is reinventing ourselves, learning more about what the customer needs to drive traffic to their booth and assist them in Event Marketing, not just Exhibits," said Buckman.
