

Merely Theatre Balance The Bard With UK Tour Using 50/50 Male and Female Company of Actors

As criticism mounts over opportunities for women in theatre, Merely Theatre use a company of five male and five female actors, producing five-hand Shakespeare productions touring the UK in 2016.

London, England -- January 20, 2016 (FPRC) -- As 2015 drew to a close, criticisms surfaced over equality of opportunity for women in the arts in the UK. While the industry as a whole flags behind other sectors, the new generation of theatre companies are taking matters into their own hands. Merely Theatre hope to start 2016 as they mean to go on as they embark on their first national tour: as the first gender-blind classical theatre company, and the first to use 50/50 casting.

The 50/50 male and female company will perform over forty shows in nearly twenty venues across England, Scotland and Northern Ireland early in 2016, produced by The Production Exchange and supported using public funding by Arts Council England.

This company will tour five-hand productions of Henry V and A Midsummer Night's Dream, beginning on January 22nd at the Uppingham Theatre and concluding on May 7th at the Kings Theatre, Edinburgh. Full details and booking information is available here.

Associate Producer Emmy Rose explained, "It's fantastic to be preparing our first national tour after working for years together in rep, honing our style. What we've created is modern, accessible and so exciting. We can't wait to connect with audiences across the country."

Shakespeare himself was no role model when it came to equality: only 16% of his characters were female. The largest female role is Rosalind, with just over seven hundred lines, while the largest male role, Hamlet, has over fifteen hundred.

One of the other major criticisms is that even when women are employed equally in number, they fall into 'subordinate' roles; the kind that would fail the Bechdel Test, where two women must speak to one another about a subject other than a man in order to pass.

To overcome these challenges in the text, Merely's unique company is used in a unique way.

Their five-hand productions of Henry V and A Midsummer Night's Dream utilize a company of ten actors, made up of five men and five women. Male-female 'twins' rehearse the same parts as one another, so there is both a male and a female actor ready to play every role. From that cast of ten, five are selected for each performance, with the genders fluidly jumbled. For example, some audiences will see a female Henry V, and others will see a male Titania. This role-sharing also creates an industry-leading progressive working environment for the company moving forward.

This approach has already yielded rewards, with a production of Henry V with four female actors (one of whom played Henry) and one male earning a five-star reviews from Everything Theatre, together with glowing audience feedback. The company does not draw attention to the gender-blind conceit however.

Artistic Director Scott Ellis explained, "Our system of putting the actors into male-female pairs and the fact that every single character could be portrayed by an actor of either sex on any given night means that we are truly 100% gender blind. This allows us to address the gender inequality in British theatre without making any sort of statement with the production itself. We simply take gender out of the equation."

Robert Myles, an actor working with the company, remarked, "When Shakespeare was around, all actors were men and actors played all the parts. Now actors are men and women, and actors play all the parts. It's got a clean logic to it, and it doesn't affect how we tell the story."

By making it a non-issue in their practice, it frees the creative team up to focus on perfecting what they see as the fundamentals of Shakespeare- clarity, focus, stakes, pace, sweat, and active choices.

Artistic Director Scott Ellis said of the work, "We're not doing this as a gimmick or because it's politically correct. We're doing it because we've worked with as many great female actors as we have with male actors, and they deserve the same kind of opportunities to play the same great roles. This way, they can. It stretches both the men and women in the cast to play parts they wouldn't ordinarily be cast in, making them more creative and robust in the process. The result has been two of the best shows we've ever produced."

About Merely Theatre

The actors, the audience, the text. Merely is characterised by playful use of space and audience interaction. Their dynamic, irreverent but focused use of text ensures modern audiences are as engaged and entertained as when the words were written. For more information please visit: <http://merelytheatre.co.uk/>

Contact: Emmy Rose, Associate Producer, Merely Theatre

Email: emmy@merelytheatre.co.uk

Phone: +44(0) 7708 822 306

Contact Information

For more information contact Emmy Rose, Associate Producer, Merely Theatre of Merely Theatre (<http://merelytheatre.co.uk/>)

+44(0) 7708 822 306

Keywords

criticisms surfaced

available here

five-star reviews

You can read this press release online here