Market Highlights:

Articaine hydrochloride is one of the commonly used local anesthetics for dental treatment. Like other amide anesthetics it blocks nerve conduction when it is inflated around a nerve. The action of articaine can be prolonged by combining it with a vasoconstrictor such as adrenaline. The dosage of articaine can be based on type and extent of surgical procedure, depth of anesthesia, degree of muscular relaxation, and condition of the patient. For pediatric patients, dosage based on their age, weight, physical condition of the patient and extent of surgical procedure.

Today's availability of a variety of local anesthetics enabled dentists to select an anesthetic which has specific properties like time of onset and its duration, hemostatic control, degree of cardiac or neurotoxic side effects that are appropriate specific dental procedures for each individual patient.

On the basis of the application articaine is most commonly used for infiltration procedures and for the nerve block in dental procedures. The local infiltration market is projected to grow at the highest CAGR of 6.9% during the forecast period. Nerve block segment is the fastest growing segment and is projected to grow at a CAGR of 7.2%.
