Due to HanifQ's vast experience with Facebook marketing and other internet marketing disciplines, he is considered a credible Fanpage Domination review critic. Mr. Quentino suggests that Fanpage Domination users should take advantage of Facebook's latest updates.

Facebook's messenger platform launched in April 2016 and new features are constantly being developed and released. The latest update to the platform offers new options for chatbot developers. Chatbots have become increasingly popular with businesses, as they enable them to interact with customers outside of business hours. Businesses can also save money with chatbots, as they don't have to employ human workers to handle interactions. Customers have also welcomed the ability to communicate with a business via text inside the Facebook Messenger App instead of having to talk to a call center representative. Facebook messenger has introduced new options for chatbots that stop users typing messages to reply; instead, users will have to use menu buttons. Chatbot developers have been trying to improve AI behind their bots for years, but the technology still has a lot to learn when it comes to recognizing how people naturally communicate.

It is unclear as to whether people will welcome these changes, as the original promise of chatbots was that they would enable users to take to chat with a business as if they were chatting to a friend, in a completely organic and natural way. Now, it seems like communicating with chatbots from businesses is to become very limited. Of course, businesses don't have to implement the new options and can instead keep the in-app keyboard in full view and allow users to compose free replies. Bot makers can now completely prevent users from sending normal text messages when chatting to a bot by inserting menu buttons where the in-app keyboard normally appears. With a limited number of predetermined replies to choose from, Facebook chatbots should become more effective, but whether customers will want to interact with them is a different question.
