A feature that is not so obvious on Twitter but it is there just the same. It is called Moments, which is its own version of Snapchat's Live Stories. It was introduced on October 2015, first as a feature exclusive to Twitter's staff and to a select group of publishers. Almost one year after its debut, it became accessible to just any user on Twitter. For those that have never seen the Moments button on the social media website, don't worry, most people haven't. This is because the Moments button was moved as a submenu of the Explore button. In other words, this feature has been hidden before it could become well-known. But for those who want to use it, they can create a Moment by clicking on the Explore button.

The Moment feature was created to increase visitor engagement to Twitter's storytelling format. While in the past Twitter was all about sharing anything and everything in 140 or so characters, this social media platform has expanded to become more alive in terms of storytelling, making it more similar to other social media sites like Snapchat and Facebook. The stats feature on a Moment can be viewed by clicking on the ellipses icon or the icon with three dots ("..."). From there, users will see various stats such as, "How many times that moment was opened", "How many users opened it", "How many likes it received", "How many times it was shared", and "What percentage of people viewed the entire moment". Current users of Twitter may or may not start using Moments, however, people who love using Facebook might just start using Twitter for its Moment.
